Historically, these shifts correlate with mining's evolution. The medieval use of "vein" coincides with early prospecting, while "face" and "shaft" gained prominence during the Industrial Revolution, when deeper, mechanized mines required precise spatial terms. "Pick", tied to manual extraction, wanes as machinery dominates, though it persists in cultural memory, as seen in mining songs.

Comparatively, other languages show similar processes–German "Ader" (vein) or French "front de taille" (face of the cut)–indicating a universal linguistic strategy in mining communities. However, English terms often retain broader, less specialized origins, reflecting its pragmatic linguistic tradition.

Implications extend beyond linguistics, preserving miners' worldviews and offering a window into their relationship with the earth and labor. Shared terminology unified mining communities, highlighting language's role in professional identity. Future research could explore metonymy in modern mining jargon (e.g., "drill", "blast") or quantify its prevalence across technical fields.

Conclusion. The analysis of metonymic transitions in mining terminology reveals language's adaptive capacity to encapsulate the practical and cultural dimensions of industrial labor. Terms such as 'vein,' 'face,' 'shaft,' 'bed,' and 'pick' exemplify how structural, spatial, and functional associations have transformed everyday words into specialized descriptors, reflecting miners' worldviews and the evolution of mining practices from medieval prospecting to industrial mechanization. This study contributes to cognitive linguistics by highlighting metonymy's role in domain-specific lexicon formation, aligning with theoretical advance-ments in conceptual blending (Fauconnier & Turner, 2002) and discourse analysis. Furthermore, it inter-sects with industrial sociology and historical linguistics, offering insights into how language preserves occupational identities and mediates human-environment interactions. Future research could extend this inquiry to comparative analyses across languages, quantitative studies on metonymy prevalence in technical fields, or explorations of modern mining jargon in the context of automation and sustainability. Ultimately, this investigation underscores the symbiotic relationship between language and labor, inviting interdis-ciplinary dialogue on the socio-cultural underpinnings of technical discourse.

NAVIGATING LINGUISTIC AND CULTURAL COMPLEXITIES IN LITERARY TRANSLATION: A CASE STUDY OF UTKIR HOSHIMOV'S "TARNOV"

Annotation. Literary translation is a multifaceted process that extends beyond linguistic equivalence to encompass cultural, emotional, and stylistic fidelity to the source text. This study examines the challenges encountered in translating Utkir Hoshimov's Uzbek short story "Tarnov" into English, with a focus on linguistic nuances, cultural specificity, and tonal preservation. Drawing on adaptation, glossaries, and tone analysis as translation strategies, the study highlights the necessity of balancing fidelity to the author's intent with accessibility for the target audience. By integrating recent scholarly research on translation theory, this article underscores the role of creativity and cultural competence in addressing the complexities of literary translation. The findings contribute to a deeper understanding of how translators navigate cross-cultural and cross-linguistic boundaries in literary works.

ЛИНГВИСТИЧЕСКИЕ НЮАНСЫ И КУЛЬТУРНАЯ СПЕЦИФИКА В ПЕРЕВОДЕ РАССКАЗА УЗБЕКСКОГО ПИСАТЕЛЯ УТКИРА ХОШИМОВА «ТАРНОВ» НА АНГЛИЙСКИЙ ЯЗЫК

Аннотация. Литературный перевод – это многогранный процесс, выходящий за рамки языковой эквивалентности и включающий культурную, эмоциональную и стилистическую верность исходному тексту. Данное исследование изучает трудности, возникающие при переводе узбекского рассказа Уткира Хошимова «Тарнов» на английский язык, с акцентом на лингвистические нюансы, культурную специфику и сохранение тональности. Используя стратегии перевода, такие как адаптация, глоссарии и анализ тона, исследование подчеркивает необходимость баланса между верностью авторскому замыслу и доступностью для целевой аудитории. Опираясь на современные научные работы по теории перевода, статья выделяет роль творчества и культурной компетентности в решении сложностей литературного перевода. Результаты способствуют углубленному пониманию того, как переводчики преодолевают межкультурные и межъязыковые границы в литературных произведениях.

Introduction. Literary translation is a dynamic process that demands both linguistic precision and cultural sensitivity to preserve the essence of a source text while rendering it accessible to a new audience. As Bassnett (2014) notes, translation is not merely a linguistic act but a cultural negotiation that bridges disparate worldviews. The challenges are particularly pronounced in translating works from less widely spoken languages, such as Uzbek, into global languages like English, where cultural and linguistic disparities are significant [2].

This study focuses on the translation of "Tarnov," a short story by Utkir Hoshimov, a prominent Uzbek author whose works are deeply embedded in Uzbek cultural and emotional contexts. The translation process revealed challenges related to linguistic equivalence, cultural specificity, and the preservation of the author's tone and style. Recent scholarship, such as Venuti's (2021) exploration of "foreignization" versus "domestication," informs the theoretical framework of this study, emphasizing the translator's role in mediating cultural differences. By analyzing specific translation strategies—adaptation, glossaries, and tone preservation—this article aims to contribute to the discourse on literary translation as both an art and a science [7].

The research questions guiding this study are:

1. What linguistic and cultural challenges arise in translating "Tarnov" from Uzbek to English?
2. How can adaptation, glossaries, and tone analysis address these challenges?
3. What insights from recent translation studies can enhance the translation process?

Literature Review. Literary translation has been extensively studied as a field that intersects linguistics, cultural studies, and literary theory. Eco (2001) argues that translation involves a process of "negotiation" between source and target texts, where perfect equivalence is unattainable.[3] Recent research emphasizes the translator's agency in navigating this negotiation. For instance, Tymoczko (2018) highlights the importance of cultural adaptation in rendering texts meaningful across cultural boundaries, particularly in postcolonial and minority-language contexts [6].

Venuti's (2021) dichotomy of foreignization (preserving source culture elements) and domestication (adapting to target culture norms) remains a cornerstone of translation studies.[7] In translating Uzbek literature, where cultural specificity is pronounced, translators often face a tension between these approaches. Studies on Central Asian literature, such as Khalidov's (2023) analysis of translating Uzbek prose, underscore the difficulty of conveying emotionally charged expressions and culturally specific terms in English, which lacks direct equivalents for many Uzbek concepts [4].

Empirical research also sheds light on practical strategies. A 2024 study by Lee and Park in Translation Studies demonstrates that glossaries and explanatory notes enhance reader comprehension of culturally specific terms without disrupting narrative flow [5]. Similarly, Baker's (2022) work on tone in translation emphasizes the importance of maintaining the author's emotional register to avoid distorting the text's intended impact [1]. These insights inform the methodological approach of this study, which combines theoretical and practical perspectives to address translation challenges.

Methodology. This study adopts a qualitative case study approach, focusing on the English translation of Utkir Hoshimov's "Tarnov." The source text was analyzed to identify linguistic and cultural challenges, particularly in terms of vocabulary, idiomatic expressions, and tone. Three translation strategies were applied:

1. Adaptation: Modifying source text elements to align with target audience expectations while preserving meaning.
2. Glossaries: Providing explanatory notes or parenthetical definitions for culturally specific terms.
3. Tone Analysis: Ensuring the emotional and stylistic register of the source text is maintained in translation.

The translation process involved iterative analysis and revision, with decisions documented to trace the rationale behind specific choices. Theoretical frameworks from Bassnett (2014) [2], Venuti (2021) [7], and Baker (2022)[1] guided the analysis, while empirical findings from Khalidov (2023) [4] and Lee and Park (2024) [5] informed practical strategies. The study also drew on consultations with native Uzbek speakers to validate cultural interpretations.

Results. The translation of "Tarnov" revealed several challenges, which were addressed through the three strategies outlined above. Below are key findings, illustrated with examples from the text.

Adaptation. Adaptation proved essential in rendering Uzbek idiomatic expressions meaningful in English. For instance, the phrase Choyingni ichib ol (literally "drink your tea") is a common Uzbek expression for having breakfast or refreshing oneself. A literal translation would confuse English readers, so it was adapted as "Have your breakfast" to reflect the story's context of a morning routine.

Similarly, the expression Xunobim oshdi conveys frustration or irritation in Uzbek but lacks a direct English equivalent. Translating it as "I was annoyed" or "I got angry" would dilute its emotional intensity. The adaptation "I was getting frustrated" was chosen, as "frustrated" encapsulates both upset and anger, aligning with the son's emotional state in the narrative.

Another example is Kapalagim uchib ketdi, which expresses fear or nervous excitement (literally "my butterfly flew away"). A literal translation would be nonsensical, so it was adapted as "He panicked, and, slipping and sliding, he rushed toward the ladder." This choice preserved the emotional weight and narrative momentum, consistent with Tymoczko's (2018) emphasis on meaning over form.[6]

Glossaries. Glossaries were employed to address untranslatable cultural terms. The word to'n, referring to a light, medium-length outer garment without buttons or a zipper, posed a challenge. English terms like "coat" or "jacket" imply different designs, so the word was retained as to'n with a parenthetical explanation: "a light, medium-length outer garment without buttons or a zipper." This approach aligns with Lee and Park's (2024) findings on the efficacy of glossaries in preserving cultural specificity without disrupting readability.

Tone Preservation. Tone was critical in maintaining Hoshimov's narrative voice, characterized by emotional sincerity and subtle humor. For example, the phrase lanati narsa (literally "cursed thing") expresses disdain or frustration. The translation "damned thing" was selected for its tonal equivalence, as both terms carry a colloquial, emotionally charged connotation. This choice reflects Baker's (2022) argument that tonal fidelity is essential to preserving authorial intent.

Discussion. The findings highlight the complexity of literary translation as a process that requires balancing linguistic accuracy, cultural fidelity, and emotional resonance. Adaptation proved effective in overcoming linguistic barriers, but it risked oversimplifying cultural nuances if applied excessively. For instance, adapting Xunobim oshdi as "I was getting frustrated" captured the emotion but lost some of the phrase's cultural texture. This tension aligns with Venuti's (2021) foreignization-domestication debate, suggesting that translators must weigh the benefits of accessibility against the preservation of cultural difference.

Glossaries offered a solution for culturally specific terms, enabling the retention of Uzbek words like to'n without alienating readers. However, overuse of glossaries could disrupt narrative flow, as noted by Lee and Park (2024). The selective application of this strategy in "Tarnov" ensured clarity while honoring the source culture. Tone preservation was perhaps the most challenging aspect, as it required not only linguistic equivalence but also an intuitive grasp of Hoshimov's style. The successful rendering of lanati narsa as "damned thing" demonstrates the importance of what Baker (2022) calls "affective equivalence," where the emotional impact of the source text is mirrored in the target language.

These findings have broader implications for translating Central Asian literature, where cultural and linguistic disparities with English are pronounced. Khalidov's (2023) research on Uzbek prose suggests that translators must adopt a hybrid approach, blending foreignization and domestication to convey both the universality and specificity of the source text. This study supports that view, advocating for a flexible, context-driven approach to literary translation.

Conclusion. Translating Utkir Hoshimov's "Tarnov" underscores the intricate interplay of language, culture, and emotion in literary translation. By employing adaptation, glossaries, and tone analysis, the study addressed key challenges while preserving the story's essence for an English-speaking audience. Insights from recent scholarship, including Venuti's (2021) theoretical frameworks and Lee and Park's (2024) empirical findings, enriched the translation process, highlighting the translator's role as a cultural mediator.

Future research could explore the reception of translated Uzbek literature among English readers to assess the effectiveness of these strategies. Additionally, comparative studies of translation approaches across other Central Asian languages could further illuminate the challenges of rendering minority-language texts in global contexts. Ultimately, this study reaffirms that literary translation is a creative and scholarly endeavor that demands both linguistic expertise and cultural empathy.
